

Editorial

The process of knowledge reclamation is often tortuous. What Africa went through in the hands of her offspring to the North, East and West has been tragic. The excavation, polishing and preservation of indigenous knowledge systems relating to ontology, epistemology, science, technology, medicine, religions, culture and civilization will require concerted efforts, dedication, determination and deliberateness. The essays brought together in this Volume coalesce around the theme of global African indigenous traditions, knowledge systems, values and ideas, and the necessity for multidisciplinary, interdisciplinary and globally holistic approaches from researchers and dedicated students of African traditions.
